

EDITOR'S COMMENT

The talking point recently has been the seven per cent increase in new personal injury claims, as outlined in the mid-year analysis undertaken by the Injuries Board.

Its six-month review (Jan-June 2015) revealed findings of a 17,132 new claims – representing a seven per cent increase on the 15,987 new claims during the same period for 2014. Motor claims are up six per cent, workplace claims are up over eight per cent and claims for accidents in public places have increased by nearly nine per cent.

The Injuries Board is now repeating its call for insurance data sharing and greater transparency in the interests of consumers and the wider society.

Changes are also afoot at the helm of the state body, which was set up in 2004 to process and award compensation in respect of personal injury claims. A new chief executive will take over on 1 October, and succeeds Patricia Byron who departed the Board earlier this year, after many years of service. Conor O'Brien has almost 30 years' experience in the financial services and IT industries. He joins the Injuries Board from his role as Chief Operating Officer at Capita Asset Services.

It's also that time of year again for NISO's Annual Conference & Exhibition, with the event on 2 October again moving west of the Shannon to the ever-popular City of the Tribes. This year also marks the organisation's 24th annual occupational safety awards, held in association with the Northern Ireland Safety Group.

Good luck to all those companies and organisations short-listed for this year's awards!
